I loved the “Last Lecture” that we watched for one of this weeks homework assignments. Firstly, it was very touching the way he told everyone right away why this lecture was happening and his outlook on his life was inspirational. Even though he was going to die, he still was super happy, bubbly, and was making jokes the entire time. This way of thinking made me instantly respect this man more and made me be interested in what he was saying. I believe throughout the lecture, what affected me the most was his attitude during the story of his life. The way he remembered his life, the people, and events around him and how positive they mostly all were. He had wonderful people and opportunities that came to him, and he accomplished so much in the time that he had and enjoyed doing it.

I have been looking at my life a lot more recently as a senior in college, and wondering how I’m going to move on from school, how I can become a professional, and how to be successful in my career. In his lecture he talked about all the chances he took to get what he wanted, and I have been thinking about this recently, so I identified with this part of the lecture the most. He took leaps and bounds of chances with getting into school, the people he was able to meet by asking, and the people that he had the wonderful experience of working with. I want to be able to have the courage to take these kind of chances so that I can have wonderful opportunities as well.
